Course Description

Historical fiction has always occupied a special place in literature for several reasons. Historical narratives record histories of peoples, cultures, and social and political crises. Historical fiction becomes especially important in history-making because it uses historical records to reflect on and re-imagine the past. More importantly, the re-imagination of the past is often bound up with the anxieties of today. Historical fiction then provides a platform for writers and readers to look to the past, the present, and the future simultaneously. This course focuses on modern Asian historical fiction and will cover the selective histories of Myanmar, India, Malaya, Korea, and Japan. Some of the larger themes that students will consider in this course include discussions of 1) genre: how do we define historical fiction; 2) types of narrative devices that are used in the representation; 3) the limitations of historical representation in literary narratives; 4) how to form a meaningful understanding of the past in historical fiction, and 5) the implications of interdisciplinary research in literary studies.

Learning Objective

This course aims to develop critical reading, writing and research skills through a study of Asian historical fiction. The reading materials in this course encourage students to consider how historical knowledge is formed and interpreted through literary narratives. More specifically, students will learn to form a critical understanding of the limits of representation in literary works. Students will also be exposed to interdisciplinary research in literary studies.

Content

1. Introduction to basic theoretical approaches to studying historical fiction.
2. Examination and discussion of historical and cultural contexts in Asian historical fiction.
3. Examination and discussion of the major authors and works in Asian historical fiction; introduction of interdisciplinary research in literary studies.
4. Students will be expected to participate in class discussions. Each student will also write a literary analysis of about 1800 words related the materials assigned in class. In addition, students will also be required to give a presentation.
